Riadh Ghemmour is an early career researcher holding a PhD in education from the University of Exeter. He is the learning skills coordinator at the Royal Central School of Speech and Drama (University of London). He is also an education consultant who has been working on different projects surrounding matters related to antiracism and decolonisation within the HE sector and beyond.

A track-record of facilitating awareness-raising sessions and action plans on antiracism in education at universities such as Edinburgh, Cambridge, Queen's University Belfast and Brunel has helped to support the development of inclusive curricula, EDI policy changes and improvements to the teaching and learning environments within these institutions.

In terms of his international profile, he is the co-founder of Decolonial Dialogues – an online platform and shared spaces that was established in 2020 to advance critical conversations about decoloniality, and also support collaborative practice between change-makers working in academic and non-academic contexts. As a contributing author, co-editor and event facilitator, this voluntary work has helped him to liaise with a broader transnational network of researchers, educators and activists applying decolonising methodologies within diverse fields of knowledge co-production.
